

WRITE YOUR BUSINESS BRIEF IN FIVE MINUTES.

One page, written once, pasted into every real conversation with an AI tool so it never starts from zero. The single most useful thing you can do before using AI in your business.

THE PROBLEM WITH STARTING FROM ZERO

The model forgets you between conversations. Retyping context every time is the reason most people give up after a week. The fix is a single document, written once and refined over a month, that you paste at the top of any real work. Every serious user of these tools has one, whether they call it that or not.

WHAT GOES IN IT (SIX HEADINGS, ONE PAGE, PLAIN TEXT)

Who we are. Business name, what you sell, where, to whom, how long you have been at it, how many people. Two sentences.

How we sound. Three or four adjectives, then two short real examples of your writing. "Direct, warm, no corporate language. We say 'you' a lot. We never say 'reach out.'"

How we work. The rules a new hire learns in week one. Payment terms. What you do not do. Minimums. Service area. Lead times. Warranty.

Prices and offers. Standard prices or ranges, packages, any current offer.

People. First names and roles of anyone who might be mentioned.

Never. Things the tool must never do or say on your behalf: quote a price not on the list, promise a date, offer a discount, use exclamation points.

Watch out. Do not put customer names, account numbers, or anything from someone else's private information in the brief. It is about you, and it will be pasted a lot.

PROMPT: DRAFT MY BUSINESS BRIEF

Interview me to build a one-page "business brief" I can paste into future conversations so you understand my business. Ask me one question at a time, no more than twelve questions total, covering: what we do and for whom, how we sound (I'll paste examples), our working rules (terms, minimums, service area, lead times), prices or packages, key people and roles, and things you must never do on our behalf. When you have enough, write the brief in plain text under 400 words with those six headings.

HOW TO USE IT

Save it somewhere you can copy from in two seconds. Any time you ask an AI tool for something real (an email, a quote, a policy, a summary of your numbers), start the message with "Here is my business brief:" and paste. Notice how different the answers get.

- Run the prompt. Answer every question in a sentence or two.
- Edit the draft until every line is true. Cut anything you would not say out loud.
- Paste it into your next three real requests and compare the results to before.
- Put a reminder on the calendar to revise it in 30 days.
